John Stamos leads America’s birthday party on ‘A Capitol Fourth’

By Jay Bobbin © Zap2it

In his first stint as host of “A Capitol Fourth,” John Stamos is guaranteed to have a big presence for an extra reason. Not only will the “Full House,” “Grandfathered” and “Scream Queens” alum introduce other acts, he’ll also continue a frequent role of his — performing with music’s iconic Beach Boys — as an addition for “A Capitol Fourth,” since the special having its traditional culmination in the 1812 Overture, canon fire will accompany that Tchai- kovsky classic … and the program information stresses that will be “live,” possibly addressing last year’s situation, when some viewers noted fireworks from an earlier “A Capitol Fourth” tele- cast had been edited in, a move prompt- ed by inclement weather in Washington that night.

The Beach Boys also played last year’s National Memorial Day Concert for the same producers — who then included the founder of both events, the late Jerry Colbert — and Stamos (who will be back in Season 3 of Netflix’s “ Fuller House”) reasons, “We need that type of music, and the sort of feeling that it evokes, now more than ever.”

Going West: Remembering television’s first Batman

BY JAY BOBBIN
© Zap2it

Q: I’m saddened by the death of Adam West. Did he do other television series besides “Batman”? — Nancy Martin, via e-mail

A: The actor did guest shots on such other classic series as “Bonanza,” “The Rifleman,” “Maverick” and “77 Sunset Strip” before he landed his first steady role as one of “The Detectives” serving under Robert Taylor in the early 1960s. More guest roles followed on shows including “Gunsmoke,” “Perry Mason” and “Bewitched” … and then came the dual roles of millionaire Bruce Wayne and Gotham City’s Caped Crusader in the mid-1960s, cementing West’s television fame forever.

He would voice the role of Batman in several animated series later, and he would appear regularly in the shows “The Last Precinct,” “Danger Theater” and “Black Scorpion.” He often did voice work on other cartoons, including “Family Guy” (on which he was “Mayor Adam West”), and in recent years, he portrayed himself in episodes of such series as “The Big Bang Theory” and “30 Rock.”

Q: I’ve heard that Vanessa Bayer isn’t returning to “Saturday Night Live” next season. Is that true? Who else is leaving? — Jeff Grant, Boynton Beach, Fla.

A: May’s Dwayne Johnson-hosted season finale of the NBC weekend staple marked the last episode for several of the regular players, Bayer being one of them. Also now gone from “SNL” is Bobby Moynihan, who had a fairly evident reason for departing, since he’s ready for primetime with the fall CBS sitcom “Me, Myself & I” — about one man’s life at different ages. After four seasons on the show, Sasheer Zamata also has made her “SNL” exit.

Q: With the “Love Actually” sequel that was shown on the Red Nose Day special, was there more filmed than was shown? And if so, will it ever be seen? — Pam Justin, Palatine, Ill.

A: There almost certainly was, considering how much territory there was to cover with that many characters (and actors). Writer-director Richard Curtis also is the mentor of Red Nose Day, and since the short sequel was made to attract people to that fundraising effort, it wouldn’t be a surprise if he eventually finds a way to market a longer version of the sequel to raise even more money to support child-centric charities around the world.

Q: I’m pleased to see Melissa Leo back on television in “I’m Dying Up Here.” Didn’t she do a Western series some time ago? — Bruce Canning, via e-mail

A: Though she’d had a run in the daytime serial “All My Children” previously, her first regular-role primetime series was the 1989-90 ABC show “The Young Riders,” which also featured Josh Brolin and Stephen Baldwin. Repeats of that program currently are being shown weekdays — two per day — on Get TV.

Eventual Oscar winner (for “The Fighter”) Leo would make a bigger television mark several years later as a star of “Homicide: Life on the Street,” and she would go on to be in the casts of “Treme” and “Wayward Pines.”
